David Hilliard's and David Rathman's diverse works of art riff on themes of memory, expected images of machismo, and a more complex modern-day masculinity. Hilliard produces multi-paneled panoramic photographs that magnify quiet, often nostalgic, and somehow very American scenes, while Rathman creates meticulous yet muddled watercolors of pop-culture remnants. Mark Moore Gallery brings the two artists and their respective media together in Great Expectations, an exhibit that adds new dimensions to their compelling work.”

Mark Moore Gallery says...

Great Expectations explores concepts of modern masculinity through two divergent mediums: photography and watercolor. David Hilliard's distinctive command of a cinematic narrative is at once romantic and disconsolate, oftentimes crafting bittersweet vignettes that grapple with notions of sexuality, faith, mortality and nostalgia. Similarly, David Rathman's mottled watercolors illustrate iconic emblems of strength and struggle, luminary and the underdog. Together, Hilliard and Rathman produce a sagacious survey of the tradition of hero-worship, and foster insightful tension between conventional and unorthodox imagery of virility. Their work yields frank complexities often overshadowed by mythic constructs of machismo.
